It’s safe to say Jack Marchette prefers to stay out of the spotlight. “I’m a huge talker,” he laughed. “But I’m not one to talk about myself.”

Despite his modesty, his efforts in his community aren’t going unnoticed. “Jack does so many great things, not only on behalf of Wells Fargo, but on behalf of our community as well,” said Northeast South Carolina Market President John Bankson. “It’s hard to keep him out of the spotlight.”

Marchette was recently named Darlington County’s Ambassador for Economic Development and was recognized by South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley at the 24th Annual Ambassadors for Economic Development Awards Ceremony on April 2 in Columbia.

The Ambassador Award recognizes ambassadors in the state for their leadership in activities that promote economic growth.

“My family has been a part of Darlington County since before the 1800s, so I care very deeply about my community,” said Marchette, Northeast South Carolina Business Banking relationship manager. “It’s an economically-challenged area, and that’s my main motivation. I want to give back and help improve the community so that the citizens have a better place to live and thrive.”

Marchette, who also is involved with numerous organizations, including the Darlington County Economic Development Partnership, the Florence Cystic Fibrosis Foundation and Helping Florence Flourish, credits Wells Fargo for the opportunity to stay connected in the community.

“Wells Fargo and particularly my wife and John Bankson have been tremendous encouragers to become involved in not just Darlington, but my entire territory where I work,” Marchette said. “The opportunities are endless with the association I have with Wells Fargo. I feel very fortunate to have that support.”

Marchette also was named a 2015 Volunteer of the Year by the Sumter to the Coast Volunteer Chapter and was recognized during National Volunteer Week, April 12-18.